Opinion: With Cardona as education secretary, these three leaders will bring wiser, research-based approaches to improving public schools. We join with educators and community leaders in Connecticut, including Eric Cooper, EdD, and Joe Nathan, to support the ascension of longtime Milford resident Dr. Miguel Cardona to U.S. secretary of education, is good news for students, families and educators. We believe these three leaders will bring wiser, research-based approaches to improving schools, including but not limited to the measures found in the federal "Ribbon Schools" program. Let's redesign schools so all youngsters learn how they're smart, rather than how smart they are on standardized tests. Every child is born with the capacity to go to college, but every child need not open that door. Talented students who enter them deserve our respect and recognition of their talents.

1. Let's redesign schools so all youngsters learn how they're smart, rather than how smart they are on standardized tests. Every child is born with the capacity to go to college, but every child need not open that door. Talented students who enter them deserve our respect and recognition of their talents.

2. Let's recognize and use the creativity, skill, talents and energy of young people. Let's provide opportunities — for students to not only study, but also to participate in diverse interests such as athletics, the arts, clubs and service learning. The Biden-Harris administration has inherited the most daunting series of crises since the end of World War II, and easing the pandemic's effects on millions of students who lack it. Distance learning and too much screen time have contributed to withdrawal and feelings of isolation. Families and educators are rightly concerned about children's mental health. They help youngsters learn to be positive, constructive citizens.

3. Let's expand the use of the most effective socio-emotional education interventions to provide students the support they will need when returning to in-person learning. Embrace the students with love, support and empathy, and help them see themselves and the cultural strengths of their communities.

4. Let's provide opportunities for students to not only study, but also to participate in diverse interests such as athletics, the arts, clubs and service learning. People want to volunteer and give back to their communities. Service learning programs save families, students and taxpayers millions of dollars and programs also bring together diverse groups of people who care about their children. A recent study has shown that students involved in service learning programs are more likely to engage in communal service in adulthood. Let's expand public school choice options that involve schools open to all students, including charter schools and a full range of non-charter programs.

5. Let's expand the use of the most effective socio-emotional education interventions to provide students the support they will need when returning to in-person learning. Embrace the students with love, support and empathy, and help them see themselves and the cultural strengths of their communities.

6. Let's connect the ascension of longtime Milford resident Dr. Miguel Cardona to U.S. secretary of education, is good news for students, families and educators. We believe these three leaders will bring wiser, research-based approaches to improving schools. We join with educators and community leaders in Connecticut, including Eric Cooper, EdD, and Joe Nathan, to support the ascension of longtime Milford resident Dr. Miguel Cardona to U.S. secretary of education, is good news for students, families and educators. We believe these three leaders will bring wiser, research-based approaches to improving schools. We join with educators and community leaders in Connecticut, including Eric Cooper, EdD, and Joe Nathan, to support the ascension of longtime Milford resident Dr. Miguel Cardona to U.S. secretary of education, is good news for students, families and educators. We believe these three leaders will bring wiser, research-based approaches to improving schools.

The election of Joseph R. Biden and Kamala Harris, and the anticipated ascension of longtime Milford resident Dr. Miguel Cardona to U.S. secretary of education, is good news for students, families and educators. We believe these three leaders will bring wiser, research-based approaches to improving schools. We join with educators and community leaders in Connecticut, including Eric Cooper, EdD, and Joe Nathan, to support the ascension of longtime Milford resident Dr. Miguel Cardona to U.S. secretary of education, is good news for students, families and educators. We believe these three leaders will bring wiser, research-based approaches to improving schools. We join with educators and community leaders in Connecticut, including Eric Cooper, EdD, and Joe Nathan, to support the ascension of longtime Milford resident Dr. Miguel Cardona to U.S. secretary of education, is good news for students, families and educators. We believe these three leaders will bring wiser, research-based approaches to improving schools. We join with educators and community leaders in Connecticut, including Eric Cooper, EdD, and Joe Nathan, to support the ascension of longtime Milford resident Dr. Miguel Cardona to U.S. secretary of education, is good news for students, families and educators. We believe these three leaders will bring wiser, research-based approaches to improving schools.

Stamford resident Eric Cooper, EdD, is president and founder of the National Urban Alliance (www.nuatc.org), a professional development and leadership organization that provides school administrators with practical resources to help them improve their schools. Joe Nathan is director of the National Urban Alliance Center for School Change (www.centerforschoolchange.org.)